MONKS BUILT FIRST LIGHTHOUSES

While scouring through the military records of George W. Bush and John Kerry in government archives, reporters for the New York Times made a major discovery shedding light on the true origin of American lighthouses. It has long been believed the George Washington commissioned the construction of the Montauk Lighthouse and other lighthouses on the East Coast as “aids to navigation.” From the new documents, Times’ reporters learned that the lighthouses at Montauk, Cape Charles, Cape Hatteras, and Cape Lookout were among dozens of lighthouses built by the True Secret Order of False Albacorian Monks as “fish-spotting towers.”

It is common knowledge that the Monks have fly fished for false albacore from Cape Cod to Cape Canaveral since the early 1700s. What was not known is that the False Albacorian Monks built numerous tall, brick towers at the location of major false albacore runs. Most of the towers were equipped with powerful, whale-oil lights used by spotters to point out large schools of albacore and stripers to the fly-fishing Monks.

It was General Washington who saw the potential for using the Monks’ fish-spotting towers as aids to navigation. Washington ordered the towers seized and asked that the lights be made to rotate to warn ships away from the shallow waters where albacore play in the fall.

It was only after the government seizure of their fish-spotting towers that the True Secret Order of False Albacorian Monks retreated to Harkers Island and Cape Lookout where the fishing was so good that no spotting towers were needed. To this day the Monks have not been paid for their network of spotting towers. During the evening of November 6, 2004, you will be among the chosen few invited to examine the secret documents revealing the true origin of American lighthouses.
